Noteworthy observations:

1. Residents of group living homes enjoy the opportunity to make their own daily choices, for example: the opportunity to choose what they will eat and what they will cook; what will he/she do in the evening and when he/she will go to bed. Residents also emphasize the possibility of growing their own garden and vegetables and the possibility of raising animals.
2. The institutions/organizations described here emphasize as follows: despite the fact that the local communities greeted the construction of a group living homes with a negative attitude, currently the local residents are happy with the new members of the community. The residents of the group living homes behave extremely dutifully, often help their neighbours (for example, they clear the snow from the entire street in winter), and share the grown crop. Thus, a positive image of the residents of group living homes is formed.
3. It is important that large institutions of social care homes do not carry out the deinstitutionalization in the same area where the social care homes are located, i.e. so that there are no more institutions/organizations providing such social services in the community where the group living house is being built. This is important for several reasons: for example: building two group living homes and a social workshop in the same street/community may lead to the creation of a large social service house again, just in a few different buildings. In that case, community inclusion will not be achieved. It will also reduce the independence of individuals, because they will not have to travel to work, so for example, a person will not learn to use the bus independently, etc.
4. It should be emphasized that deinstitutionalization in Lithuania is understood as a multifaceted process. This is not just about the "elimination of large social care homes", but a process in which the external need for help is increasingly reduced⁶. For example, depending on the person's abilities, different forms of accommodation with support are possible: group living homes (residents of group living homes receive necessary services at home full-time and use other community services); independent living homes (providing minor assistance to compensate for the loss/lack of independent living life skills) and sheltered housing (combining accommodation services with individual case manager/a social worker assistance and other services in the geographic community). A person with a disability who has chosen to live in a group living home and has acquired the necessary skills can move to an independent living home and then to a sheltered housing. The complexity of the DI process is also manifested in the fact that other services promoting independence are ensured, for example: supported decision making; social workshops, so this report covers even several different services.
5. It is worrying that some services provided in the context of the DI process are financed as project activities, without transferring them to the social system, i.e. without transferring them to the legal act of the social system, i.e. without regulating them as social services. For example: such a service is a supported decision making.
